

the bar convocation

the first encounter:

the morning sun gleams upon rooftops, birds are chirping their soft rhythmic melodies into the still space. the curtains undressed by the opaque light. my closed eyes are in the way of the nesh light, melatonin escapes my restful body. "oh, i had to rise anyway!" i utter these words with a higher octave than usual. my attention is fixed on the interpretations of the waterman's opinion of how the early morning blue sky would birth multiple clouds to wet the environment. i often enjoy the saturday strolls to the market side, to which it leads me to the famous bar titled "free the soul", the name was quite baffling - considering my recent discoveries on the intoxicant beverage & how it affects the soul. i walk the plank of my soul's despair - into the fancy bar. normalcy would be to sit there for 2 hours exchanging closed syllabus with the bartender that would frequently ask about my well being, it seemed like a troublesome topic to really register myself into, as it was something i had lost all control over. instead of doing my plain self-aggrandizement activities, i decided on taking the liberty of exploration in the socializing department. i observe with a soft gaze, as if a child learning to cross the road. everyone seemed so sure of themselves - so overconfident, but then my eyes are met with the beauty of the woman sitting in the corner of the bar. she seemed out of tune with her friend's conversation. my knees quiver with each step i take towards her, "this is unusual, the gin must be kicking in" i said, as defense so i could develop a sense of control over this situation. however, it appears that it was my heart reacting to what lies before my chinese shaped eyes. such beauty has never confronted me, her skin was so beautiful, light bouncing off her evenly - shaping her perfect face structure, her big eyes absorbing me into her soul. before i could join in at the table which was occupied by propaganda that served her very little, i had to calm myself down. i gulp the cold glass of gin, & await for it kick in - minutes later i find myself beside her, i wave with a smile at her friends & i begin conversing with her. after an exchange with Lucy, we grew wiser in knowing each other, but the night had no interest in building our bond even more stronger. knowing each other on the surface level didn't suffice to mold us as companions. i felt so vacant, yet sufficient simultaneously.

the zealous delight:

after my first encounter with Lucy was briefly cut by the concise night. a great deal of pain took over as i relived that time benimming night in my feverish mind. i chastise every now & again, because i keep heading to bar only to see no sign of her. days pass, weeks pass & a few months pass too. sobriety never seemed like something my mind, body & spirit would be accustomed to. a lot seemed so substantial, i worked on my self throughout the time. i acted prematurely to assume that she may become someone significant to me. however, clinging to this idea was really transformative for me. one saturday evening while taking my night stroll along the castle on green grass in the market side, my purblind eyes slyly sees a figure that resembles her, a voice that changes now & again - but i have learned all about her different tones. "it can't be!" i start jogging to the indistinct speech that was chattered. i was confronted with astonishment, i gazed at her & placed my body into the corner of her eye. there i was staring at Lucy & she was too. it was nerve wrecking. she approached me & said, "hi, stranger" with a soft tone. even though her initial plan was to spend time with her companions. she asked if they could go ahead without her. our hearts contredanse in the parking lot as if in the ball. we converse more & more, speaking our way to the language of love. we had an intellectual conversation, speaking about astrology in trying to strengthen how well we know each other. we begin to forget all that surrounds us. in this evanescence space i cup her left hand, drawing along the lines in her palms studying her every marking. i press my right hand softly on her left cheek & we kissed away any doubts. we live over the brush of our emotions right now.

the beginning of forever:

laying down in our garden, our bodies twiddle against each other. this feeling is like no other, maybe something that happens once in every eon. it felt like sucking straight from the breast of love, getting to taste the essence of it, i will forever cling to the breast that beholds this. her lips are as soft as marshmallows & far taster than them, my lips will forever be beckoned by them. her face makes me believe that mirrors aren't real, such beauty is inconceivable. our bodies incite when our eyes would meet our hands to undress our bodies, & make love in the fair night in the garden. what i most love is the big heart that out stretches her bosom, she loves so delicately, she nurtures all that she loves like a mother to a child. we'd sit in our balcony, with our telescope, drinking wine & eating great food whilst we stargaze. when she sings wrapped in her slightly open robe, i would paint her every detail while my ears soak in the magic in her voice. the mornings are way better than before, i'd awake next to my golden honey skin wife. we'd meditate together while holding hands, do yoga practices so our bodies can get flexible. but what was more special about the morning was the breakfast in bed, in it served with the most whimsical of uncooked vegetables we find quite tasty. little foot steps would knock onto the ground towards our sanctuary space, & the door would be burst open by our daughter Curly. she would regularly ask why do we act so weird whenever she came to our room. Lucy & i always found amusement to that question.